

THE NATIVE FIRES

The fires kindled by the Natives, in different parts of the country, have spread with alarming rapidity, and presented a grand and interesting spectacle. The Country, on the banks of Melville water, on Sunday last, from Mr. A. Butlers, to point Walter, was one continued blaze, and was as splendid a scene, as could well be imagined. The extent of this fire gave rise to a report, that both Mr. Butlers premises, and those at the point, were destroyed; but it is perfectly unfounded. The windows of the latter place were broken, it is supposed by the Natives, no further injury however has been sustained. We are persuaded the origin of these fires is not at all to be attributed, to any malicious intent on the part of the natives; they resort to their accustomed practice of lighting a fire in the bush, for the purpose of cooking, and from the bush being highly inflammable at this season, it extends with resistless violence. Mr. Lenards Farm on the Swan, had a narrow escape a few days ago, but from the ground contiguous to the house being well cleared, the flames were, with some exertion subdued without any injury to his property. On Monday night, a similar fire extending its ravages over Mount Eliza, Lieutenant Carew most promptly ordered out the military, and hurried to the spot; by their exertions, assisted by some active Volunteers, all apprehensions of danger were allayed. The Natives had breakfasted on the spot that morning, which sets all speculation at rest as to the origin of the fire.

---

THE NATIVE FIRES

---

The fires kindled by the natives, in different parts of the country, have spread with alarming rapidity and presented a grand and interesting spectacle. The country, on the banks of Melville Water, on Sunday last, from Mr. A. Butler's to Point Walter, was one continuous blaze, and was as splendid a scene, as could well be imagined. The extent of this fire gave rise to a report, that both Mr. Butler's premises, and those at the point were destroyed; but it is perfectly unfounded. The wires of the latter place were broken, it is supposed by the natives no further injury however has been sustained. We are persuaded the origin of these fires is not at all to be attributed to any malicious intent at all on the part of the natives; they refer to their accustomed practice of lighting a fire in the bush, for the purpose of cooking and from the bush being highly inflammable at this season, it extends with resistless violence. Mr. Lenn farm on the Swan had a narrow escape a few days ago, but from ground contiguous to the house being well cleared, the flames were, with some exertion, subdued without injury to his property. On Monday night, a similar fire extending its ravages over Mount Eliza, Lieutenant Carew most promptly ordered out the military and hurried to the spot; by their exertions, assisted by some active volunteers, all apprehensions of danger were allayed. The natives had breakfasted on the spot that morning which set speculation at rest as to the origin of the fire.

---